

Mark A. Camillo

Mark Camillo is recognized internationally as a law enforcement and security professional, with exceptional expertise in the area of major event security. He is credited with directing the security operations of some of the most critical infrastructures in the world.

Mr. Camillo began his career in law enforcement as a Special Agent in the U.S. Secret Service where he completed a distinguished 21-year career that included three separate assignments at the White House. Specialized assignments at the White House required protecting four U.S. Presidents and family members in various capacities and ultimately being head of the White House Security Branch, which encompassed the supervision of daily security, emergency preparedness and all-hazards operations at the White House Complex.

Following his final White House tour of duty, Mr. Camillo continued his advancement in the Secret Service being appointed to the position of Deputy Assistant Director, detailed to the headquarters of the newly created Department of Homeland Security. He continued working in critical assignments until his return to Secret Service headquarters where he was appointed the Chief Technology Officer for the agency.

Mr. Camillo held several key positions during his career in major event planning, but the most notable was being appointed the Olympic Coordinator for the 2002 Salt Lake Winter Olympics. Under his direction, the Secret Service executed its mission through Presidential Executive Order to design, plan and implement the Federal operational security plan for the Games. The successful execution of this carefully designed preparedness and prevention plan was later identified by the White House Office of Homeland Security as an excellent model for future security designs at Events of National Significance.

The innovative and highly effective approaches employed at the Salt Lake Olympics earned Mr. Camillo the distinction as an Olympic Security Expert, evidenced by invitations to address audiences nationwide that included U.S. Senate testimony. His expertise has extended internationally as well, with speaking engagements before security planners worldwide who hope to draw upon his experiences and insight as they prepared to host major sporting events in their respective Countries.

Upon retirement, Mr. Camillo entered the private sector, where he currently serves at Lockheed Martin Corporation within the Transportation & Security Solutions operating company. Mr. Camillo's duties focus on developing business in the areas of public safety and homeland security.

Mark serves as an appointed member of the American Society of Industrial Security's Global Terrorism Council, an active member of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, and Chair of the Board of Trustees for the Academy for Venue Safety & Security conducted bi-annually by the International Association of Assembly Managers.
